

Regulating time in cells

David Rand

`dar@maths.warwick.ac.uk`

Mathematics Institute

University of Warwick

Coventry CV4 7AL

United Kingdom

Abstract

Why do molecular circadian clocks have such complex structures when it so easy to make an oscillator out of one or two genes and their protein products? What are the environmental effects and evolutionary pressures and how has this determined design? I will present a new analysis of these topics that gives some general principles for the design of regulatory networks and suggests a new approach to sensitivity analysis.